I don't agree with that change, the option "all questions per page" will be useless when the "review answer" is true ...

I'm not sure we understand each other :-)

My point here is that, when you have "all questions on one page" with, let's say, 40 questions (quite common for exams), if you mark them for review, when you finish the first time and want to review only the ones marked for review, you still have all the questions shown, which is confusing and time-costly.

I don't understand why the "all questions on one page" would be made useless. Could you give an example?

I get your point, but I still think that it will be useless because you're converting an "all questions on one page" into a "one question per page" in order to review the questions. I agree that it will be annoyed to review an exercise with 40 questions ... (sigh)

We need a teacher point of view, maybe?

OK, now I get the misunderstanding.

What I mean is still to use the "all questions on one page" mode, but hide the questions that have not been marked for review (this can simply be CSS + JS to "fold" the non-marked questions).
